

BPL poses a major interference threat to numerous high frequency services, including homeland security back up communications networks. BPL must be proven to be "interference free" before it is implemented. The technology is proven to be flawed and field tests reveal that BPL makes a major part of the high frequency spectrum unusable for any type of communication, including commercial short wave broadcasting. The FCC must imposed strict interference guidleelines on BPL and enforce those standards.